Sport climbing dates from the early 1980s when leading French rock climbers wanted to climb routes that offered no cracks or fissures in which to insert the temporary protection equipment used in traditional climbing. Sport climbing was rapidly adopted in Europe, and particularly in France and Germany by the emerging professional climbers such as German climber Wolfgang G#252;lich and French brothers Marc Le Menestrel [fr] and Antoine Le Menestrel [fr].

As sport climbing removes the danger of a route by using bolts, sport routes are
